GUIDE to GLASS

Glass wine cellars are exploding in popularity, showcasing prized collections like works of art. But can these stunning displays provide the stable environment fine wine demands?

Yes, but... You will need to plan well to overcome the hurdles that glass (especially frameless, single-pane products) presents to cooling units and creating optimal conditions.

UV rated glass protects bottles from natural light

Glass can double the amount of cooling required

Double- or triple-paned glass is more efficient

Planning for Cooling

Building a wine cellar that protects your collection requires careful attention to these five essential elements:

- 1. Ideal Temperature: Regardless of the types of wine you are storing for the long term, the goal remains the same: keep them at 55 Fahrenheit (13 Celsius) and avoid fluctuations.
- 2. Help the Cork: Maintain ideal humidity levels (50-70%) to help natural cork enclosures last a lot longer.
- 3. Pick the Proper Unit: Choose the right cooling system (self-contained, ductless, or ducted) based on your cellar size, budget, and construction type. Ensure the unit has sufficient BTU capacity.
- 4. Insulate Well: Proper insulation (at least R-19 walls, R-30 ceiling) and near airtight construction are crucial for stable temperatures.
- 5. Insulate Well, Part 2: Install insulated, exterior-grade doors with weather stripping. If using glass, opt for double- or triple-pane insulated products.

Store wine at 55 degrees

Ducted is usually preferred over ductless systems
